

A few more thoughts . . .

Expressed by D. from Berlin, Germany

For those of you who believe in god: Where is he and why hasn't anyone really seen him up to now?

Why has science still had no veritable proof that god exists?

And nonetheless so many people all over the world believe in him. Or rather, they believe in some god. What exactly they believe varies from culture to culture, from religion to religion, from individual to individual.

For those of you who are nonbelievers: Would you say, all those religious people all over the planet are mad?

Who wants to dictate what we should believe? Who wants to fix how the truth is defined?

Does not anyone of us have the right to define his view of the world individually and to find his own beliefs?

Some of us believe that an object can have a soul or a spirit, as well as others believe in god.

There is no scientific proof of it and many people might not think the same or understand. But only for this it does not have to be totally wrong, as well as you can't call all religion wrong.

It might seem wrong for you personally and for many other people as well. For us it is the truth and we don't force anyone to share.

Just like someone who is sincerely religious. We are not more or less mental than anyone who confesses and stands by what he believes.
